A number of circulating tumor DNA (ctDNA) biomarkers, such as circulating tumor cells, fragments of nucleic acids, or protein biomarkers, have been developed for patient diagnosis or prognosis. Here, we report a new ctDNA biomarker for detecting occult metastases in micro-metastatic breast cancer. We developed a novel approach to detect ctDNA biomarkers in tumor-free breast tissues and blood. Blood ctDNA was obtained from primary breast tumors and paired metastatic breast cancer (MBC) sites in 106 MBC patients. ctDNA was eluted from breast tissue samples using a lysing buffer, followed by isolation and purification of genomic DNA fragments from the eluted ctDNA via a combination of size fractionation and quantum dot-based labeling. These genomic DNA fragments were enriched for the presence of ctDNA biomarkers through a cross-exchangeable affinity procedure. The enriched genomic DNA fragments containing ctDNA biomarkers in the MBC blood samples were validated by resequencing. A total of 189 genomic DNA fragments from the patient blood samples were validated to contain ctDNA biomarkers. Forty-four percent of these fragments were located near genes that are associated with breast cancer
