Hosting a Web Site that provides hundreds or thousands of trackable files for download can be a time-intensive chore. Whether your Web site's sole focus is advertising or branding or a combination of the two, getting the Web site ready for a launch can be daunting. The good news is that most of the time can be spent on the "content" of the Web site - and in this day and age, content is what sites are all about. A Web site doesn't need to be loaded down with the traditional bells and whistles that sites have been using for years. Instead, you can get creative with your Web site's look and feel, without sacrificing content, by getting rid of the traditional requirements for Web sites, like having a "front page" and having a "home page" from your database or having thousands of files. If you're not familiar with a database, it's simply a list of all the content on a Web site. When you want to export all the content for download, make sure you have a blank site (no content) ready to go. Make sure you have the database set up and ready to import, and then, using the Web site's capabilities, you can easily export the content. For example, the Web site itself acts like a single database, and each page of the Web site can be made into a separate table, thus eliminating the need to have a database front end (like a Web site). All this allows you to download massive amounts of content from a Web site in a short amount of time. The Creative Cloud is a subscription-based service from Adobe.
