We report an extremely rare case of odontogenic fibromyxoma in a child. A clinically and radiographically well-circumscribed tumour was found during clinical investigation of pain on the mandible of a 6-year-old girl. Histopathological examination confirmed the diagnosis of odontogenic fibromyxoma. With only 20 well-documented cases of this lesion ever reported, the extreme rarity of this tumour is difficult to appreciate without reporting more cases. A number of different machine learning methods exist for learning predictive models of events or behaviors, such as stock market price changes, prescription drug sales, customer satisfaction, etc. Such models are typically trained on a huge number of historical data points and are updated for new data points as they become available. One requirement for these methods, however, is that the historical data points must be presented to the machine learning algorithm in a consistent manner. Otherwise, trained models may produce results that are, at best, only partially accurate. Thus, in today's retail applications and other industries where modeled predictions are relied upon, there is a continuing need for improved methods of creating and presenting data models to machine learning models for training and predicting. Racial-ethnic differences in the association of body mass index with CKD risk. We investigated racial-ethnic differences in the association of body mass index (BMI) with CKD incidence. Using the Kidney Early Evaluation Program (KEEP) data, we included 2202 incident kidney disease cases during 11 years of follow-up. To evaluate the association between BMI and kidney disease, we employed Cox proportional hazards regression. In the study cohort, African Americans had a higher BMI than Hispanics and Whites 04aeff104c
