So at 640p on an iPad Air 2, this rendering of paradise is actually looking pretty good. It's a bit chalky, gray-toned, but it won't leave you with a white cast. Look closely and you'll see the various ways this photographer went about creating this rather tricky piece of art, the result of a lot of Photoshop editing and compositing. This is a good example of a video iPad can do. Boozeman provides a step-by-step tutorial for her entire doodle. She first loaded her photo into a blank Photoshop composition and then began drawing. At the beginning of her project, she was using a desktop software called BenQ Graphic Designer and wondered if it would adjust to the iPad's large screen. The mobile version allows you to view the image on the iPad, but it doesn't allow you to see the layers; hence there's much less control. But there's still a lot you can accomplish with the app. I'd like to zoom in extra close on the layers here. I can't. So I saved the file as a PSD, opened it in Photoshop and worked on it there if I wanted to. As Gizmodo points out in this piece, the iPhone remains the most popular smartphone. One thing to remember when choosing a computer is that you want a computer that is powerful enough to do what you want it to do. In other words, you don't want a computer that is powerful enough to do everything you want it to do! While Photoshop is a multi-tasking application, your computer will need some RAM in order to successfully complete even the simplest of tasks. An easy way of knowing whether your computer can handle Photoshop or not is installing Photoshop on a computer, plugging in a monitor & keyboard to that computer, and opening the application. If after about 15 seconds of operation, your computer locks up (you will be presented with a screen that looks like this:) If after a few minutes of operation the computer locks up, you have an issue and you might need to consider upgrading to a computer that is more powerful and/or more RAM. If after several minutes of operation, your computer is still responding and you are able to operate the application, your computer is doing just fine. Even with the highest quality CPUs and RAM, you will always have problems with programming applications. Because Photoshop is a multi-tasking application, it will usually lock up at some point if you have a slow, outdated CPU and/or RAM. There's no way to shorten the time it takes to "freeze." (Be aware that freezes can be a result of a power outage, too much RAM or CPU, or a virus, among other things.) But if you want to stay productive, you do need to buy good equipment. And it's not always cheap. 933d7f57e6
