Adiponectin, a protein secreted by the adipocytes and involved in glucose and lipid homeostasis, is negatively associated with the development of insulin resistance and atherosclerosis. This study sought to examine the possible influence of obesity and diet on serum and adipose tissue specific adiponectin mRNA expression levels. In a first study, the effect of mild energy restriction (10% reduction of energy intake) on adiponectin mRNA expression levels in adipose tissue and serum was investigated in 10 non-diabetic healthy obese subjects. In a second study, the effect of obesity, weight loss and refeeding on adiponectin mRNA levels in adipose tissue and serum was assessed in six diet-induced obese non-human primates. In the diet-induced obese non-human primates, adiponectin mRNA levels were compared in animals fed a high-fat, high-carbohydrate diet (HFD) and in animals fed a low-fat, high-carbohydrate diet (LFD) for 8 months. As compared to normal-weight controls, obese insulin-resistant subjects had lower serum adiponectin levels and lower adiponectin gene expression levels in adipose tissue and serum. The expression of the adiponectin gene in adipose tissue was almost exclusively adiponectin gene II mRNA, that the expression of the adiponectin gene in serum appeared to be predominantly adiponectin gene I mRNA. The effects of mild energy restriction on adiponectin gene expression levels in adipose tissue and serum were not significant, whereas a pronounced weight loss, but not re-feeding, in diet-induced obese animals led to a statistically significant increase in serum adiponectin concentrations and adiponectin gene expression levels. The changes in adiponectin gene expression levels appeared to be mediated, at least in part, via an increase in the serum insulin concentration. In conclusion, a decreased adiponectin gene expression in adipose tissue and/or serum appears to play a
