To evaluate the feasibility of providing postexposure prophylaxis (PEP) to men who have sex with men (MSM). During a 6-month period, MSM who attended a public health clinic for a sexually transmitted infection (STI) screening were asked to participate in a pilot program of offering PEP for HIV infection to partners with whom they had anal or oral sex within the previous 72 hours. During the study period, 61 MSM accepted PEP and had STI examinations. Of the 61 participants, 6 (10%) had HIV infection; the HIV-positive men identified in this pilot program presented a spectrum of recent infection (time between last negative and first positive HIV test = 12-38 days). The most common diagnoses were chlamydia (23%) and syphilis (17%). Most men with HIV infection reported having had sex with more than 1 partner during the previous 2 weeks, and almost half had used drugs within the previous 30 days. PEP was available and used by 9 MSM; all of the participants used
