One of the key features of this version is a new dark mode setting. You can set Lightroom to either use a photo-visualization preset, allowing you to see your actual image inside the dark mode environment, or you can select other preset styles to create your own unique look. Here I am, in a dark room, demonstrating how to change the look of photos when working in the Darkroom mode, including changing colors, contrast, and other tools. The Photos are not completely absent from Lightroom 5. A new Enhanced Photos panel now allows for easily enabled operations such as face detection, Image smarts, curation, and more. You can even now have an upper-right panel pop up when you enable Enhanced Photos, allowing you to quickly access your details, or you can fire up the Adobe popup panel to access your more detailed information. There used to be a way to select the location from which you want to pull photos - now you can select a time frame, and even set up a specific location area. One of Lightroom 5's most highly anticipated features is smart developing. Developers can see at a glance which photos have the best potential, what steps can be taken to improve them, and even quickly tag photos with new keywords linked to social data. You can also tag people as being in your photos, similar to Amazon's image recognition or Google's Plus feature. With the new Lightroom mobile app, social photo sharing is seamless. Once you upload a photo, you simply need to name it and provide a caption, and it will be included in your Creative Cloud folder. After a few seconds and your image is uploaded, you can then share it on social media or even embed it in your site at or if you like. Again, from your photos you can see any existing "tags" you have added.
